Mobile Web Final Reflection
By Christian Sainz

For the final project I wanted to make a portfolio site to showcase all the art projects I have worked on recently. The site would also direct prospective clients to where they can contact me; either through the form on the site or my social media.

I initially did a prototype that showed different categories of art I was interested in making, but with a busy school semester I didn't have time to have as many completed works on the site. I decided to simplify and have a section showing finished works I had done recently, and another section showing some of my favorite sketchbook pages. I did keep the concept of having the most recent work displayed on the home page. I also had the "collaborate" button on the homepage that way people who scrolled down would have a direct shot towards the contact page if they were interested in business inquiries.

I kept the same color palette for the site as I had in the prototype. I did decide to leave the button yellow because I thought it made it pop more, and felt it was a good contrast to the purple I used on the site.

I think something I would like to add more of to is a section showing recent art Tik Toks I've done and have them be a way to direct people to that social media account. I also want to process videos on my youtube channel soon so that way it's not a blank page that they get directed to when they click the icon.

I think there are things that could definitely be fleshed out and improved, but I'm pretty happy with it. I would like to take it further after this and get more of my art up on the site soon.
